TENNIS TITLE FOR 1915 DEPENDS ON ONE MATCH

Followers of Game Will Not Be Satisfied Until McLoughlin and Williams Meet Again—East's Poor Prospects in Chicago This Week.

By J. PARMLY PARRET.

This is the fourth successive tennis season in which chief interest has centered on the relative skill of McLoughlin and Williams. The very first year after Williams returned to America from Europe he made a place for himself at once at the top of the experts of the country close behind McLoughlin, and he has not lost it since. For these four years, curiously enough, there has not been any other ranking than McLoughlin first and Williams second, and hardly a single other player to threaten the supremacy of either. The rest of the field has been far behind, notwithstanding the unexpected defeat of Williams by Church in the intercollegiate finals last fall.

These two stars have met eight times, and only once has Williams been the victor. The last meeting took place only last week, when McLoughlin again won, and before the tournament began it was freely predicted, and a better schedule could be arranged to leave out some of it. There has been a steady increase during the last few years of the importance of long distance play, and that has been going on. Californians have gone West to meet their equals, and the biggest tournaments here no longer depend on the few leading Eastern cracks to make up their star entry lists. Bids are put in for the coast meet to add spice to the matches, and they have been forthcoming generally during last year, and this in the later part of the season.

True to expectations, the Californian won the first four times, repeating his victory in the East and the second contest being an eleven inning affair. Sloppy fielding was the principal cause of the victory, but the defeat, as they say, of the Dodgers in both cases.

The Cubs made a game bid in the ninth inning of the opener, forcing Douglas to retire after batting in four runs. Smith stopped further scoring, however. Daubert's double and two long flies saved the deciding run in the aptics. Schulte got a homer in each game.
